The impact of the new data set on the gameplay experience can be seen in a number of aspects, including: FIFA 22 will include a brand new set of 16 authentic player movements and control options, including authentic running, passing, shooting, dribbling and goal scoring. FIFA 22 will include a brand new set of player controls. This includes a new face control system, whereby players change direction by using the face of the controller or another part of the controller, including the grip and thumbsticks. The player can also shoot while ducking or head-diving, which moves the player directly in the direction of the shot. FIFA 22 will introduce new on-ball controls and new AI that are designed to react to the new set of player controls. This includes players moving off the ball when receiving a pass or shot, and players more accurately tracking passes to look for specific players. FIFA 22 will include revised mechanic tree and better goalscoring opportunities. The visuals in FIFA 22 will be updated to look more realistic on PS4 Pro. The enhancement was created using the newly developed Stage Design technology, but will also be applied to the future FIFA titles, enabling more realistic rendering for users of all platforms and ensuring the team continues to push the technological boundaries in real time simulations. The official release date for FIFA 22 is February 14, with the launch titles available for PC, Xbox One, PS4 and on iOS and Android devices the same day. For more information on FIFA 22, visit and follow @PES or @FIFA on Twitter. The H7N9 influenza virus -- the first avian flu virus of the H7 subtype -- appeared in humans in March. By the end of last month, 203 people had been infected, and 18 were dead, government figures showed last week. New cases of H7N9 virus were detected in China's three eastern provinces, including the capital, in the past week, after weeks of quiescence. The H7N9 virus is genetically different from all the H5N1 viruses that have been known to infect humans, according to researchers in China. This, along with reported complications, might explain why H7N9 has caused such higher-than-expected mortality rates. But the virus could spread throughout Asia and beyond -- and changes in its genetics might well make it more deadly. The first
