Compensatory increase in preoptic and medial amygdala electrical activity in transgenic hamsters. The preoptic area and the medial amygdala are important regions that may play an important role in the reinforcement of motivated behaviors. The electrical activity of these two regions was studied in transgenic hamsters expressing a bacterial beta-galactosidase gene (lacZ) under the control of the c-fos promoter. beta-galactosidase immunocytochemistry showed that neurons in the preoptic and medial amygdala were activated in transgenic hamsters as well as in control animals following exposure to novelty or cat odor. In order to study the functional significance of increased preoptic and medial amygdala activity following the exposure to novelty or cat odor, rats were tested for preoptic stimulation using one-shot tests. They were first injected with muscimol or saline into the preoptic area, and were then tested for an aversion to cat odor. Saline-injected rats showed no conditioned avoidance behavior; muscimol-injected rats showed a significant aversion to the cat odor. In a similar experiment, hamsters were first injected with muscimol or saline into the preoptic area, and were then tested for avoidance of novelty. Saline-injected hamsters avoided novelty, but
