More particularly, the present invention relates to new phthalic esters, which can be used as a caffeine or theobromine precursor by reacting the compound with an amine. As used herein and in the claims, xe2x80y9cphthalic anhydridexe2x80x9d or xe2x80x9cphthalic anhydridexe2x80x9d means an ester obtained by the reaction of phthalic acid (HOOcxe2x80x94CH2xe2x80x94COOH) with an alcohol. Caffeine and theobromine are organic nitrogen-containing compounds which can be derived, for example, from coffee, cocoa and cocoa beans. These compounds, therefore, possess a wide range of valuable applications, ranging from chocolate, tea, cocoa, and the like. Compounds that are derived from theobromine are very valuable, since theobromine itself possesses the same cardiovascular benefits as caffeine, but without the dose-related stimulating effect. For example, theobromine is the active ingredient in theophylline, which, as a bronchodilating agent, is commercially available in tablet form, under the trademark TIMOXIL., from Glaxo Wellcome. This compound has also been proposed for commercial use as a deodorant. Caffeine, on the other hand, is a drug that can be used to treat asthma and as a bronchodilator. It can also be used as a treatment for insomnia and for muscular tension. Currently, it is widely used in the pharmaceutical industry and in food products. For example, cocoa is the source of theobromine (2%), caffeine (2%) and the lipids. Other natural sources of theobromine and caffeine are, for example, tea.
