Roughly 30 minutes after Apple's launch, Apple's iPhone App Store was so full of applications that users had to add more than 1,000 to the store's home screen to be able to see them all, and Apple's App Store was still overflowing with apps nearly a month later. Now Apple has released the iPhone Dev Portal – a new site allowing developers to upload their software to the App Store. But, it seems that, even within hours of the Dev Portal opening, the new site has already been overwhelmed and even crashed several times, with hundreds of broken links and nasty error messages aplenty. Apple's Dev Portal is yet another sign that Apple is committed to taking a serious approach to a new market it has long ignored. And judging by the App Store's popularity, it seems that Apple has delivered a polished iPhone App Store with a touch of class and style to match its slick devices. The new App Store is perhaps the most significant change to Apple's iPhone since it launched in June, alongside the device itself and on the heels of the iTunes Music Store, which was a surprise hit when it launched in April. Apple's app-centric approach to products is at the heart of the iPod's value proposition – that its iPod Touch, iPhone and Macs can be used to buy and consume content on the go, just as you would on a home computer. Apple has also altered the management of its App Store, making the process faster and easier. If you go to the App Store's main page, you can now select which apps you want to see from the home screen without having to click through the App Store as a whole. Instead, you can tap one of the application categories on the left hand side of the store home page – Games, Entertainment, Utilities, Books, and the like – and then click on the app icons you want to include on your home screen. The new approach is intuitive – it makes it easier to pick the apps you want to add to your phone and it makes it simpler to find new apps you might like. In addition to the new browsing and searching systems, Apple has also added a new App Store experience for developers. While it's a relatively minor tweak, the developer page now also displays similar information to the news feeds that offer product updates for products such as Apple TV and iPod Touch, providing a consistent framework for developers and customers alike. b7e8fdf5c8
