One Room Challenge #10 - Pre-Sleep Storytime Our storytime room has not been used in a really long time. Why? Well, one of the biggest rooms in the house is the bathroom, and that room has taken over more than enough of the spare time. The plan has always been to put the storytime room back into use when we had a baby; however, it was just more of a basic plan than a real plan. We're now on our third baby, and even with our growing family, I'm still having a hard time fitting in time to get the pre-sleep storytime ready. Plus, at the moment, there's still a space in the dining room and a space in my office that I'd love to fill with a storytime space. I finally decided to use this space for a little experiment. One of the earlier ideas was that I'd go back to the Ikea d0c515b9f4

The weather pattern The intense and warm air of the past days is a factor behind the very warm air throughout the continent, even in places such as the North Pole. We need an explanation for this weather pattern One of the climate models at the European Center for Medium-Range Weather Forecasts (ECMWF) explains that this might be caused by the unusual high wind speeds around the atmosphere. However, this model is still in the development phase. Therefore, the ECMWF has developed the ECMWF Intense Wind (IW) model, which provides different explanations for the high wind speed in relation to the weather patterns. The ECMWF researchers explain that a weather pattern is initiated when the air reaches the surface with very low wind speed. This kind of pattern indicates an unstable atmospheric state where upward motion is restrained by atmospheric barriers, such as temperature inversion layers. They continue that the generation of the IW model is to better understand what causes these atmospheric processes at the surface level. The ECMWF Intense Wind model is based on an "averaged weather" method (AWM), which is a high-resolution model simulating the atmospheric weather and the atmosphere's response to the surface changes. The ECMWF Intense Wind model was developed in 2012 as a first step. It tries to find out the sources of this hot air by describing the atmospheric conditions that cause the higher than average temperatures. This model was designed to observe which factors influence the unstable atmospheric state. The investigation for the current weather pattern began when the underlying model was in an unstable state, and then it was embedded with the atmosphere model and the surface. The ECMWF Intense Wind model contains three additional layers in the atmosphere: upper boundary, lower boundary and the
